

Why vs Why: Big Australia

Why vs Why: Big Australia I think its a terrific ideaIts a series of small but perfectly formed booksits a very civil little series of books a good way of presenting these sort of issues. - James Valentine, ABC ...a balanced approach to controversial issues... - Carlene Ellwood, The Sunday Tasmanian ...the perfect physical embodiment of the gay marriage debate... - Andy Noonan, Sydney Star Observer The question of whether Australia should welcome population growth or avoid it remains unresolved. The issue raises its head in public debate in different guises from controversies over importing labour to filling vacancies in booming industries like mining, to temporary work visas and refugee quotas, from pressure on infrastructure and services in cities to boosting regional areas who makes up Australias population and what level it should be remains a sticky issue. THE YES/NO CASE FOR THIS IMPORTANT ISSUE The two positions are presented in an easy to read 2-books-in-1 format. Both authors discuss the seven key reasons why we should say yes/no to Nuclear Power and further investigate the evidence behind each of these reasons through their seven chapters. Importantly, this book leaves no issue hanging. On top of their seven key arguments, each author gives a punchy rebuttal to their opponents specific arguments. YES: Researchers Dr Oliver Hartwich and Jessica brown make the case in support of population growth, arguing that a bigger Australia would be a better Australia with higher living standards, prosperity and vibrant cities. NO: Scholar and poet Mark OConnor offers the case against a Big Australia, and argues that population growth is neither inevitable nor wise, and that any advantages from population growth will be outweighed by issues of survival and sustainability.
