Not illustrated. 1900 Excerpt: ...a bend in the feeder about 100 feet above the upper section, and another bend about 1,000 feet below the lower section. The meter section was between the rodmeasuring sections, 75 to 100 feet distant from them. The Cornell University canal has vertical sides of concrete and a concrete bottom. One side is at present roughened somewhat on account of the lining being cut out in places preparatory to its repair. The canal is 16 feet wide, 10 feet deep, and 415 feet long, with a standard sharp-crested weir, and with gates at the upper end for admitting water and at the lower end for controlling the depth of water in the canal, and with piezometers and gages for measuring accurately the head on the weir and the depth of water in the canal. The discharge of the weir is known for any head on it, so that a simple measurement of the head gives the discharge of the canal. The discharge can then be measured with rods or current meter and compared with the weir discharge, and thus the error by the rods or meter be determined. The weir is 220 feet above the point where the rod measurements were made, and 15 feet below it are baffleboards for quieting the water. About 70 feet below the meter section is a bulkhead, and at the side of it are two rectangular gates. During the experiments the water passed out of the canal through two horizontal slits in the bulkhead, used to secure velocity in all of the water section. At the higher velocities some water passed out under one of these gates. The width of the Cornell channel was only from one-fourth to one-half that of the channels in which the field comparisons were made. At Cornell the water was probably moving in a more disturbed condition than in the canals and feeders. The retarding effect of bottom and sides was loss in...
