

Governmental Tracking of Cell Phones and Vehicles: The Confluence of Privacy, Technology, and Law: Congressional Research Service, December 1, 2011

Technology has advanced considerably since the framers established the constitutional parameters for searches and seizures in the Fourth Amendment. What were ink quills and parchment are now cell phones and the Internet. It is undeniable that these advances in technology threaten to diminish privacy. Law enforcements use of cell phones and GPS devices to track an individuals movements brings into sharp relief the challenge of reconciling technology, privacy, and law.
