

Building Homes on Used Land

Re-using land that has been previously developed is a government priority in terms of allocating land for housing development. However, the presence of contamination in the land set aside for redevelopment can pose huge problems for developers and their advisors. Using 10 case studies of sites that have been used for a variety of different purposes, the book describes how different developers have tackled the physical and regulatory problems of redevelopment. The case study sites include private and social housing starter homes to executive dwellings, in urban and rural locations.
